Materials and Methods

Data Description

During the month of January 2010, we sampled all Twitter user accounts created between February 2008 and April 2009, collecting up to 400 messages from each account. Therefore, the messages in our sample were all written in the time period beginning in February 2008 and ending in January 2010. We do not expect that the results we obtained would have differed had we sampled a different time period. Our measures of PA and NA are, in general, normally distributed. Since person-hour PA and NA are fractions of words (lexicon words divided by total words), their values range from 0 to 1, that is, from no PA/NA words to only PA/NA words. We would not expect person-hours to be normally distributed, and indeed they are not ( $N=139.6M$ ;  $M=0.0551$ ,  $SD=0.0748$  and  $M=0.0218$ ,  $SD=0.0490$  for PA and NA, respectively). However, users' baseline PA (averaged over  $24 \times 7 = 168$  time points for each user) is normally distributed ( $N=2.06M$ ;  $M=0.0552$ ,  $SD=0.0214$ ), as is NA ( $M=0.0212$ ,  $SD=0.0140$ ). The individual mean PA and NA for entire countries ( $N=84$ ) are also normally distributed ( $M=0.0534$ ,  $SD=0.0031$ ) and ( $M=0.0199$ ,  $SD=0.0021$ ), and no countries have extreme values.

Though large and diverse, our data is not statistically representative of the global population or that of any particular country. In particular, we do not know the gender, race or age distributions of our sample, nor of the socioeconomic or occupational attributes of the individuals in our dataset. Because interest in and access to the internet are characterized by deep "digital divides" (S1) that separate people by demographic and socio-economic differences, we would not expect our sample to represent demographic categories in proportion to their numbers in the population. A recent survey by Arbitron and Edison Research (S2) reports that Twitter users are 51% white, 24% African American and 17% Hispanic, and people with college and advanced degrees are overrepresented, as are people with higher household incomes. Therefore, we believe our sample includes far more diverse demographic categories than an earlier generation of laboratory-based studies of diurnal affective rhythms, which have been limited almost entirely to U.S. undergraduates.

Time & Location

Each message received using the Twitter API is time-stamped relative to UTC (Coordinated Universal Time). However, most Twitter users' accounts include their self-reported time zones (e.g. "(GMT -05:00) Eastern Time (US & Canada)", "(GMT -06:00) Mexico City", "(GMT +01:00) Rome") which identify not only a distance from UTC, but also the user's country of residence. Using this information, we used the Java Calendar and TimeZone classes to normalize all time-stamps to local time, as well as identify daylight savings time in that location. We used the 141 time zone codes to identify individuals by country and, in some cases, city. Table S2 shows the mapping of time zones to countries.

Lexicons and Affect Measurement

We measured time in two ways, as hour of the day (0-23) to capture diurnal variation, and as hour of the week (0-167) to capture inter-day variation in diurnal cycles (with Sunday designated as 0-23, Monday as 24-47, and so on). We measured mean affect during each person-hour, giving either 24 or 168 observations for each individual, depending on whether the 24-hour time scale is disaggregated by day of the week. For each hour, we counted the number of words across all messages by an individual that appeared in the positive and negative word lists, respectively. We then expressed that number as a proportion of all words in all messages by an individual in that person-hour (including words that did not appear in the lexicon). Formally, where  $h \in H$  and  $H = \{0 \dots 167\}$ , or the 168 hours of the week (24 hours/day \* 7 days). The measure for NA was computed similarly, as were the measures taken over 24 hours.

Person-hours were weighted equally regardless of the number of messages within them, based on our interest in measuring the affect of the individuals in the Twitter population, not the Twitter corpus itself. Thus, verbose and laconic individuals contribute equally to the mean. (We tested for possible correlation between verbosity and affect and found none.) Finally, our measures of affect are based on proportions rather than raw counts of word occurrences and are therefore not biased by variation in Twitter activity from hour to hour or day to day; this variation is shown in Figure S1.

Measures of positive and negative affect Intuitively, positive (PA) and negative affect (NA) might seem to designate opposite ends of a single affective spectrum. However, almost all laboratory studies of diurnal rhythms have used separate measures of PA and NA, based on consistent empirical evidence that the two measures vary independently (4, 5, 6, 8). Positive affect comprises feelings such as enthusiasm, delight, activeness and alertness, while negative affect comprises feelings like distress, fear, anger, guilt and disgust (6). Thus, low positive affect indicates the absence of positive feelings, not the presence of negative. For example, psychologists point out that suicide is typically associated with high negative affect and is most common in mid-morning, when alertness – a component of positive affect – is highest (4). Our results confirm what an earlier generation of researchers have found using self-reports – PA and NA are insufficiently correlated to warrant collapse into a unidimensional measure. As noted in the main paper, we measured the correlation between the within-individual PA and NA scores for each person-hour in our data. A strong negative correlation would support the use of a unidimensional measure, while a correlation close to zero would indicate the need for separate measures. The observed correlation ( $r = -0.08$ ) is close to zero, reflecting the underlying independence of PA and NA.

Measures of within-individual and between-individual variation.

Previous laboratory research on affective change has focused on diurnal variation within the individual, not on changes in the collective mood of an entire population. The two measures are not equivalent since changes in the collective mood could be due to affective differences between individuals whose activity is concentrated at different times of the day. In contrast to psychologists, who have focused on variation within the individual, recent studies by computer and information scientists (e.g. Mislove et al. (16)), have measured temporal variation in the collective mood, by taking the mean affect across all individuals at each hour. However, this makes it impossible to know whether the reported changes reflect the aggregation of individual diurnal rhythms or the tendency for individuals who are active at different times of the day (e.g. "morning people" and "night owls") to differ in a mood level that is relatively invariant over time.

Therefore, in order to measure how individuals (rather than the population) vary over time, we decomposed the affect measures into two components: between-individual variation (within hours) and within-individual variation (across hours).

Between-individual variation captures how individuals differ from one another in their baseline affect regardless of the time of day or day of week. It is simply the individual's mean affect across all hours:

$$BPA_u = \overline{PA_u} = \frac{1}{\|H\|} \sum_{h \in H} PA_u(h) \quad (2)$$

Note that the between component is the individual user's mean over time and therefore does not vary from hour to hour.

The within-individual PA score for a person-hour measures the signed difference between the person's score that hour and their baseline as defined in (2). Within-individual scores are comparable across people because individuals' baseline tendencies toward being upbeat or downbeat have been removed, leaving only the change over time that is within each individual:

$$WPA_u(h) = PA_u(h) - BPA_u + \frac{1}{\|UH\|} \sum_{(u,h) \in UH} PA_u(h) \quad (3)$$

where  $(u, h)$  pairs indicate user-hours and  $UH$  is the set of all such pairs in the dataset.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Throughout this section, we use  $u$  to index the set of users but  $h$  as an argument to a function. This is because users are discrete entities but time is in principle continuous (even though we measure time as 24 or 168 discrete hours in practice). In other words, we think of PA and NA as continuous functions of time, but for the purposes of measurement, discrete hours are the most convenient units of analysis.

The final term in (3) is the grand mean across all user-hours; it is a constant and, as noted earlier, is 0.0551 for PA and 0.0218 for NA. It does not change the result beyond shifting the y-axis to aid interpretation.

The following lines of Stata code further explicate the construction of the between- and within-individual measures in the above equations (each row in the dataset is a user-hour):

Stata command	Equation
<code>replace pa = pa / tokens</code>	(1)
<code>by uid, sort: egen pa_b = mean(pa)</code>	(2)
<code>egen pa_gm = mean(pa)</code>	$n/a$
<code>gen pa_w = pa - pa_b + pa_gm</code>	(3)

Figure 1 plots the mean over all users of within-individual affect for each of 168 hourly observations per user:

$$WPA(h) = \frac{1}{\|U(h)\|} \sum_{u \in U(h)} WPA_u(h) \quad (4)$$

where  $U(h)$  is the subset of users who were active during hour  $h$ .

Likewise, Figure S2 reports variation over the day and week in mean between-individual PA:

$$BPA(h) = \frac{1}{\|U(h)\|} \sum_{u \in U(h)} BPA_u \quad (5)$$

Though  $BPA_u$  does not vary over time, the hourly average of the user averages does vary over time, due to changes in the composition of the set of active users,  $U(h)$ , who differ from one another in their baseline affect. Individuals with different baseline affect levels differ in the time of day when they tend to be active.

Comparison with Figure 1 reveals important differences between individuals' time of peak activity. A similar morning PA peak to the one in Figure 1 indicates that, in addition to individuals experiencing relatively high PA in the morning, it is those individuals with high baseline PA who are most active at this time. On the weekend, there is a similar two-hour delay in peak PA, which plausibly reflects the tendency for activity level to be delayed while "sleeping in." From the morning peak onwards, between-individual PA remains much higher on weekends than on weekdays, suggesting that those individuals most active on the weekend also exhibit the highest baseline PA.

The need to separate between-individual and within-individual affective differences is further supported by evidence of interactions between the two measures. We tested for interaction by comparing within-individual diurnal rhythms across four groups: "morning people," "afternoon people," "evening people," and "night owls," based on when most of their messages were posted on Twitter (6:00 am-12:00 pm, 12:00 pm-6:00 pm, 6:00 pm-12:00 am and 12:00 am-6:00 am).<sup>2</sup> Figure S3 shows that the first three groups are very similar to one another and to the overall pattern of within-individual changes in both PA and NA reported in Figure 1 in the main text. We observe high PA levels in the morning followed by a decrease, then increasing again toward the end of the day, and NA levels which peak late at night and are lowest in the morning. However, we discovered a very different diurnal pattern among "night owls." The morning peak in PA occurs about two hours after the morning peak for everyone else (perhaps because they are sleeping in), and there is no late-night peak. Meanwhile, NA peaks twice for "night owls," but only once for everyone else, and the morning peak occurs when NA is lowest for the other three groups. Though we observed that high-NA people tended to be more active late at night, we note that those who are most active at night ("night owls") exhibit neither higher NA at night, nor overall.

Though we measured activity cycles based on the time periods in which users posted the largest number of messages, we do not assume that these users are more active offline during these same times. We discuss these groupings here only in order to demonstrate that temporal variation in affect at the population level cannot be unambiguously attributed to the diurnal rhythms of individuals, due to the confounding effects of affective differences between individuals whose activity on Twitter is concentrated at different times.

Seasonal Variation

Our seasonal analysis parallels our diurnal analysis; instead of grouping messages into person-hours, we group messages into person-months. This results in up to 25 months (February 2008 - January 2010) per person in our sample. As with the diurnal analysis, we are interested in within-individual variation, not between-individual changes in aggregate behavior caused by changes in the composition of the population during a period of very rapid growth in Twitter's user base. Therefore, as we did for the diurnal analysis, we mean-centered individual affect scores. Mean-centering removes differences between individuals in their baseline affect level while preserving temporal differences (diurnal or seasonal, depending on the time frame of the analysis). Otherwise, the seasonal analysis would be confounded by the tendency for newer cohorts to express greater affect. The explanation for greater affective expression among newer users is outside the scope of our study, but we surmise that Twitter's rapid growth during these two years may have attracted more mainstream, less technically-oriented users.

Even after mean-centering on person-months, we observed a within-individual increase in affective expression over the two-year period, for both early-adopters as well as successive cohorts. This increase is roughly comparable in magnitude to the amount of diurnal change we observe between the peaks and valleys of an individual over the course of a day. This within-individual increase parallels, and perhaps reflects, the between-individual increase associated with an influx of new users, which may have changed expectations about appropriate content among earlier users as well. Whatever the reason for the within-individual increase, it also must be removed in order to isolate hypothesized effects of seasonal changes in daylength. Therefore, after mean-centering individual scores by person-month to remove between-individual differences, we then mean-centered the corrected scores by month for each of the 25 months over the two-year period in the analysis.

<sup>2</sup> Users are distributed as follows: late-night ("night owl") 7.41%; morning people 16.46%; afternoon 36.27%; evening 39.86%. The distribution of messages is similar, indicating that no single group dominates the aggregate results.

The daylength at a given location on a given day is governed by the day of the year and the latitude at that location (25). Figure S4 illustrates the model in (25), showing how daylength and change in daylength vary over the year in three cities of different latitudes.

Since we know only individuals' home country and time zone and not their specific location within that country, we cannot pinpoint their precise latitude. As a best approximation, we assigned each individual the latitude of the city associated with their reported time zone. Outside the U.S., time zones are designated by principal cities, as listed in Table S2. For the U.S., we used the latitude of the largest city within each time zone. (As a robustness check, we also assigned these individuals the latitude of the population centroid of their time zone, with no detectable change in the results.) Knowing each individual's approximate latitude, we used the formula provided by Forsythe, et al. (25) to assign each message the number of hours of daylight for that day at that location.

Robustness of Text Analysis

Measurement error and the methodological limitations of automated text analysis have been discussed at length in the technical literature on computational measurement of affect. One way in which automated text analysis might provide spurious results is if a few terms dominate, especially at particular times. For example, morning and evening peaks in PA might be artifacts of frequent occurrences of the word "good," through the use of such phrases as "good morning" and "good night." Fortunately, these expressions do not occur often enough on Twitter to affect our results. Although "good" is the most frequent affective expression on Twitter, and although many of the morning occurrences of "good" are as modifiers of "morning," the expression "good morning" turns out to contribute little to the overall measure of positive affect. The research tools we developed allow us to verify this by filtering out expressions that might distort the affect measures. When we repeated the analyses excluding all instances of "good" followed by "morning" and "night," the results showed no discernible differences.

A potentially more troublesome scenario is the occurrence of "good" preceded by "not," which has the opposite affective implication. In our corpus, "good" appears, at maximum, in 4.93% of messages in a given hour, while "not good" appears at maximum in 0.049% of messages per hour, a difference of two orders of magnitude. This difference implies that the potential for "not good" to distort the results for "good" is quite minimal. Similarly, the proportions for "happy" and "not happy" are 2.37% and 0.027%, respectively. As with "good morning" and "good night," we are able to filter out all occurrences of terms in the PA and NA lexicons that are preceded by "not." Here again, the filtering had no discernible effects.

The internet has given rise to a variety of affective indicators that are specific to the genre of internet conversations. The most prominent of these are "emoticons," or facial expressions represented typographically, such as the "smiley face," represented with or without a nose as :-)) and :) as well as its frowning counterpart, represented as :-{ and :( . Unlike the LIWC lexicon, emoticons have not been used to track affective changes, and there are no studies confirming the validity of emotions as a measure of affective expressions. Nevertheless, we examined temporal changes in the use of smiling and frowning emoticons and found that usage was too sparse to be able to detect a consistent pattern. To get around the problem of sparse data, we combined the emoticons with the LIWC PA and NA lists, in effect treating each emoticon as a "word" in the lexicon. However, including the emoticons had no visible effect on the patterns reported in Figure 1.

Cross-Cultural Analysis and English Proficiency

The cross-cultural analysis in Figure 2 is limited to countries in which English is a primary language, but in some cases other languages are also in widespread use. Moreover, English is not the primary language in many of the larger set of 84 countries included in the seasonal analyses. Therefore, in addition to limiting our analysis to speakers of English, we tested whether our lexical measures for PA and NA are sensitive to English proficiency and dialect. To that end, we assigned each individual a proficiency score based on the proportion of the words they used in all messages which appear in a 350,000-item list of English words from the Moby project, a public-domain lexicon-building project.<sup>3</sup> The proficiency score is correlated with individual mean PA ( $r=0.58$ ) and NA ( $r=0.41$ ), which is to be expected since use of English affective words requires using English words in general. To correct for this, we limited the analyses to users who were proficient in English (as explained in detail below). Once non-proficient users were removed, the correlations between the proficiency score and PA ( $r=0.09$ ) and NA ( $r=0.06$ ) were reassuringly small.

Figure S5 shows the distribution of English proficiency across the population. We see that for residents of the English-speaking countries included in Figure 2, the proficiency score is unimodal with a peak at about 0.9, a steep decline below 0.9, and very few speakers below 0.8. (The proficiency score rarely reaches 100% because the English lexicon does not include items like typos, proper nouns, or some affixes.) For non-English-speaking countries, however, the distribution is bimodal, with a secondary peak at about 0.9 and a primary peak between 0.4 and 0.5.

In order to separate proficient from non-proficient speakers, we excluded those below 0.8 in all countries. We chose 0.8 based on the frequency distribution of proficiency scores in English-speaking and non-English-speaking countries (see Figure S5). In order to be certain that the results are not sensitive to the choice of 0.8 as the cutoff, we replicated all analyses using 0.9 as the cutoff, with no meaningful change in the results. Table S1 shows the attrition due to English proficiency.

Countries vary in numerous unmeasured ways besides linguistically (for example, culturally and socio-economically). This precludes the use of country as an explanatory measure for between-individual PA and NA variation. Instead, all our measures rely on within-individual changes, which removes the between-individual differences that could be attributable to language proficiency. Since English proficiency is not expected to vary within individual, it cannot explain the PA or NA variation within individuals that we observe.

Informal Language & Slang Use

Affect may sometimes be expressed in Twitter-specific informal/slang terms, or terms peculiar to on-line communication, either verbal or written. Since our study examines text from across the world, the data captures possible variations in the affect-laden slang terms specific to individual cultures. Our analysis is therefore susceptible to measurement error to the extent that the LIWC lexicon does not include these items.

LIWC's homepage<sup>4</sup> describes the sources of its lexicons as coming from lab studies in the U.S., Canada and New Zealand for people in "all walks of life," including students from elementary school to college, the elderly, and prisoners. Other sources include articles from Science, British and American novels, recordings of naturalistic conversation in public places, and weblog posts. The fact that these texts cover a variety of genres from American- and British-influenced sources increases confidence in its coverage, especially since English-speaking countries across the globe typically reflect British and American cultural influences, through mass media and foreign presence, both historical and contemporary.

Nevertheless, total coverage of all possible affective expressions is impossible. Internet-specific slang that is not in the lexicon will go unmeasured. If the lexicon is more sensitive to the affective expressions of some cultures than to others, then their baseline affective levels will vary as an artifact of the lexicon rather than due to underlying differences in affect, a parallel situation to the English Proficiency measure described in the previous subsection. As we note there, due to the potential for artifactual results, we do not use country as a variable to explain between-individual affect.

Time zones and countries/regions. <sup>(a)</sup> Afghanistan and Iraq are excluded due to the counfound with Americans located there. <sup>(b)</sup> Iran is excluded due to the prevalence of Western activists who changed their time zones to Tehran as a gesture of political support. <sup>(c)</sup> Ecuador is excluded because a relatively large number of users are identified with this time zone who do not, in fact, appear to be connected to Ecuador. <sup>(d)</sup> Some other time zones are excluded because they cannot be identified geo-spatially, have no users, or are associated with small islands whose internet-connected inhabitants are likely to be mainly from other places.
