IT would be superfluous to dwell in this place on the deep and enduring interest that attaches to the microscopical study of protoplasm. Since the time when the studies of Cohn and Schultze led to the general recognition of protoplasm as the material substratum of vital activity—a conclusion so eloquently set forth by Huxley in his celebrated essay on the physical basis of life—this interest has continually increased, as we have come to see even more clearly that all biological phenomena are directly or indirectly traceable to the effects of protoplasmic activity, for we have thus been impelled to seek for an understanding of that activity in the morphological structure of protoplasm, as revealed by the microscope. It is small wonder that to this quest some of the ablest of modern biologists have devoted their best energies. And yet, if we take account of the actual

* This lecture is printed by permission of Professor C. O. Whitman, Director of the Biological Laboratory at Wood's Holl, and Messrs. Ginn & Co., the publishers of 'Biological Lectures delivered at the Marine Biological Laboratory, 1889-99,' in which it will appear. A more adequately illustrated special paper on the subject, containing more specific references to the literature, is now in press. It should be borne in mind that such delicate textures as those seen in the protoplasm of living cells cannot be properly illustrated by black and white figures. The accompanying text figures, though copied as accurately as possible from the original drawings, are of necessity relatively rude and schematic.

MSS. intended for publication and books, etc., intended for review should be sent to the responsible editor, Professor J. McKeen Cattell, Garrison-on-Hudson N. Y.
